

Make a small static webpage which consists of a form to display text and a text entry area. The form will use javascript to read another text file called questions.txt in the same directory, which is read into an array. The form will use a random number to select a line of text from the array and display the text. Below the text, place a free form text area. When the user presses enter, select another random line of the text to display. Also make a button with text "next" which below the text area will also advance to the next random line same as pressing enter. Call this web page "nextQuestion" with both the page name and a header above the text. Place text below the submit button that says "Press enter or select next to advance to next question".

Explanation

- File Loading: The script uses the Fetch API to load questions.txt. It splits the content by newlines and filters out any blank lines.
- Random Selection: The `nextQuestion()` function selects a random line from the questions array and displays it in the ``.
- User Interaction:
 - When the user types in the textarea and presses Enter (without holding Shift), the page triggers `nextQuestion()` and clears the textarea.
 - The "next" button below the textarea also triggers the same function.
- Page Name & Header: Both the document title and the `<h1>` header use the text nextQuestion.

Place this file and your questions.txt in the same directory and open the HTML file in your browser to test the functionality.

How It Works

- Questions Integrated: The list of 120 questions is embedded directly into the JavaScript array.
- Random Selection: The `nextQuestion()` function randomly selects a question from the array and displays it.
- User Interaction: Pressing Enter in the text area (without using Shift) or clicking the next button advances to another random question, while clearing the text area.

This approach bypasses any CORS issues by removing external file fetching entirely.
